Zenit

Zenit
The Zenit, the name engraved in Cyrillic letters on the prism housing front, is the first in a long and popular series of cameras gradually evolving throughout the remaining period of the past century. The first improvement was to include flash synchronization with the model Zenit C. After ten years a completely new and improved camera body was introduced with a hinged back for film loading.

Zenit | Camerapedia | Fandom
Zenit cameras (sometimes badged in Cyrillic, ЗEHHT or ЗeHyM) were made by the KMZ factory near Moscow. The original Zenit is an SLR based on the Zorki rangefinder (itself based on the FED, which is a copy of the Leica II). The first few Zenit cameras have a 39 mm screw thread lens mount, exactly like that of the Zorki.
